

FAN as a Grounding Tool in Uncertain Times

Resource #2: Mindful Self-Regulation

- Mindful Self-Regulation (MSR) helps you gently catch yourself in the moment when you feel out of balance and use strategies to feel calmer and see more clearly.
 - You can use MSR anytime. It's your superpower.
- Self-awareness is key. Reading your own cues is a place to start.
 - Don't be surprised if you are reacting more intensely. You may feel:
 - More revved up: hard to sit through zoom meetings, feeling impatient when people are talking, can't stop watching news, feeling jittery, judgmental
 - More slowed down: forgetting important things, hard to start day even if you are a morning person, not "getting much done," feel sad or grieving
- MSR is truly personal. What works is what helps you feel calmer and more aware.
 - Common strategies are deep breaths, encouraging self-talk, soothing imagery.
 - Grounding may be especially helpful now with so much changing. Take a walk and feel each footstep, stand tall and ground your feet, put on music and dance; alert your senses: bring something in from nature, a new leaf reminding you of growth or use those gift soaps that you have been collecting.
- All you are doing right now requires extra energy. You may feel more tired or on edge.
 - You are a co-regulator. Everyday tasks are more demanding: supervising stressed staff, supporting worried parents, working from home with children to care for.
 - Replenish yourself with small things that bring pleasure, rest or new perspective. Your favorite guilty pleasure can play a role and best if done with intention!
 - Reach out to your co-regulators who calm, uplift, exercise or laugh with you.
- Embrace self-compassion, especially when things are hard for you.
 - We all will have moments when our protective bubble bursts: when we feel fear or when the anxiety of someone close to us seems overwhelming. These are times to be kind toward our self like a compassionate friend would be.
 - Kristen Neff's steps for self-compassion can help (Self-compassion.org):
 - Acknowledge that this is a stressful moment: "This is scary." Self-compassion is good will toward us not good feelings.
 - Recognize our common humanity and that suffering is part of life: "There is so much that is unknown for all of us. I don't like this. Nobody does."
 - Be kind to yourself using gentle, encouraging words: "May I be patient."

Hold these ideas lightly in your mind.

We've never done this before.

Be gentle with yourself.
